The kings horses and men found lodging at an inn called The Horns, a short distance beyond. The Black House was afterwards for some time the seat of Sir Hugh Smithson,--a great benefactor of the poor of Tottenham, and ancestor of the Dukes of Northumberland. The house was pulled down in 1740. Meynardsons, on the N. side of Tottenham Green, was a many-gabled red brick mansion, built in 1590, and was in the middle of the 17th century the seat of Alderman Sir Abraham Beynardson, Lord Mayor of London 1649, who for refusing to proclaim the Act abolishing the kingly power, was dismissed from his mayoralty by the Parliament, fined ?2000, committed prisoner to the Tower for two months, and declared incapable of holding the office of alderman or mayor in future. He died at his house at Tottenham Oct. 4,1661, and after lying in state at Merchant Taylors Hall, was buried with great pomp in the ch. of St. Martin Outwich. After serving for many years as a boarding-school for sons of Friends (Quakers), the house was taken down in 1810. Grove House, a plain quadrangular structure, with a semicircular bay at one angle, was for several years the residence of Sir Michael Foster, Justice of the Kings Bench, 1745-63, an eminent lawyer and the Old Foster just of Churchill. He was a native of Tottenham, where his family had long been settled as solicitors. Grove House was afterwards the residence of Mr. Ardesoif, noted for his wealth and extravagance. Passionately addicted to cock-fighting, he backed his favourite bird, which had hitherto won every match, for a heavy sum. The bird was beaten...
